.Deformation of the fetal thoracic cage at 2.5-4.5 months of gestation in the prone position. Our purpose was to assess deformation of the fetal thoracic cage during supine and prone positioning of the fetus. Six human fetuses of similar fetal crown-rump length were placed prone in the left lateral decubitus position, while supine in the right lateral decubitus position. To enable repeated acquisition of the same transverse section of the fetal chest, a frame was constructed on the anterior surface of the fetal chest and fixed to the fetal thorax by foam rubber. Transverse images were acquired with a mechanical sector scanner, at a mean gestational age of 36.8 \pm 2.0 (SD) weeks and an angle of 20 degrees relative to the long axis of the thoracic cage. The thoracic cage was stable in the supine position and the prone position in fetuses of similar gestational age. The diameters of the thoracic cage were not affected by the supine position. During the prone position, the distances between the thoracic cage and the transverse plane of the anterior surface of the fetal chest were decreased at the right anterior midline and left anterior midline, while the left lateral chest-wall angle was decreased at the left anterior midline, compared with the
