Murine strain combinations have been used to study the immunological response during acute graft-versus-host disease (GVHD). To elucidate the mechanisms of GVHD, we analyzed the immunoglobulin (Ig) isotype expression of host effector cells infiltrating the liver, lung, and gut at different times after transplantation with allogeneic effector cells. Using anti-Thy 1.2-antibody and immunohistochemistry, we observed Thy 1.2+ T lymphocytes to be the predominant effector cell population in the lung at all times after transplantation. In contrast, by immunohistochemistry, Thy 1.2+ T lymphocytes were absent from the liver and gut at the time of GVHD induction and then increased in frequency, peaking at day 10 after transplantation. The development of the acute GVHD response after allogeneic transplantation was associated with a selective and coordinated increase in the percentage of IgM+ and IgG1+ cells. However, the increase in IgG2a+ cells was delayed, with IgG2a+ cells seen only in the liver on days 7 and 10, when the number of IgM+ and IgG1+ cells was maximal. In contrast, the population of IgM+ cells was not significantly changed. These data demonstrate that the acute GVHD response is associated with a preferential expansion of effector cells with a particular pattern of immunoglobulin isotype expression.A conventional antenna using a ferrite core is known as one type of the antenna which is used in a cellular phone.
